Introduction:

Single parent poverty is still a reality for millions of lone mothers and their children around the world. The rate of extreme poverty among divorced or separated women (8 per cent) doubles that of divorced and separated men in low- and middle-income countries. Among 40 high and upper middle-income countries, lone-mother-households have higher rates of poverty across every single country, data shows (UN Women 2020).

In times of high inflation rates, conflict and climate change, income-poor lone mothers more than ever need targeted public policies providing, inter alia, appropriate social transfers and high-quality flexible childcare services, access to education and opportunities for skilling as well as labor market regulation allowing them to access and obtain decent employment. However, debt crises in the Global South and austerity measures in the Global North lead to shrinking budgets. What is more, gender advocates are alarmed by the global anti-gender backlash and its effects on social policies. Accordingly, progressive governments increasingly face an antifeminist discourse stigmatizing lone mothers and questioning public support.

This event will discuss the complex risks, causes and consequences of single parent poverty, with a focus on lone mothers, highlighting best practices and promising policies to prevent and to end poverty. It will highlight intersectional approaches to design programmes for and with lone mothers and discuss strategies to implement these policies in a challenging political environment.

Guiding questions:

- What are the causes of single parent poverty, especially of lone mothers? What are particular consequences of lone-mother-poverty for women in all their diversity, their children and society in general?
- What are promising examples of public policies supporting single parents? And how can we design policies to address causes, reduce risks and prevent single parent poverty?
- How can we move beyond stigma and rally public support for single parents?

Objectives:

- Educate and raise awareness about single parent poverty from an intersectional perspective.
- Explore best practices and promising concepts to fight single parent poverty.
- Bring together relevant perspectives from government, international organisations, academia and civil society.
